

THE MORNING AFTER THE NIGHT BEFORE

SOUTHERN UTAH PRESS SAYS THINGS.

What Some of the Papers Think of the Midland Route and Decision in Selecting the Price Canyon Route.

Judging from the remarks being made by some of the papers to the south of Price the press of that section does not think much of the decision of the Indians excursionists in selecting the Price canyon route.

Elucidating on the subject, the Salina Call under the heading, "Salina Canyon-Emery Road Gets It In the Neck—The Best Route and Pinned First, But It Is Kicked, Lied About, Knocked and Ignored," says: "Salina and part of Emery county got it with a broad axe right where Mary wears her beads in the matter of the Midland trail, so it seems. Our people are not back yet from the trip and no word has been received. It is evident, however, that the auto tourist party was influenced to go by way of Price and Price canyon. The Salina canyon road was ready before time and was tried out and found to be a splendid road, but it was lied about, knocked and misrepresented. All the Salt Lake papers boasted like Trojans for the Price road but refused to take a word about the Salina road. We shall have more to say later. Surely it does look as though Salina had been worked to a frazzle."

Under the caption, "Auto Tourists Refuse to Listen to Arguments For Legitimate Route and Have Awful Time Traveling Over Chosen Route," the Castle Dale Progress publishes the following:

"Refusing to listen to the just arguments of the people who have responded to the appeals of the Midland Trail people that they help to make the roads fit for travel in any and every way they could, and even refusing the civilities that are due between citizens, the party of Indiana automobile manufacturers, much diminished in size and led sheep-like by the would-be potentate, Westgard, who managed to pick his way over the route some time ago, and insisted on a repetition of the stunt to the exact detail, were turned to the Price canyon route and were last heard from as they were leaving Price yesterday morning after the previous day's travel over a trackless 'boulevard.' Those competent to judge who felt inclined to treat the matter as all optimistically, insisted that the time of their lives would be experienced in getting through Price canyon, and we are not doubtful of the matter in the least."

On the day of publication of the Richfield weekly the information of the route chosen by the excursionists had not reached that town. Here is what the Reaper harvested:

"Before leaving Salt Lake City, Mr. Woolley and Mr. Heppeler received the assurance of the members of the state road commission that the proposed Grand canyon road would receive their ardent support, and they were also promised the use of the state convict camp for one year in the construction of the road."

"The matter of the route over which the excursionists from Indianapolis will pass within a few days was also given some attention by the road commission. A strenuous effort has been made to have the road through Price canyon and over Soldier Summit completed in time to accommodate the motorists, but there is still work to be done and much to the dismay of the people of Northeastern Utah, the excursionists will be forced to come by way of Salina canyon and thence north."

UNCONSCIOUS GOOD

By F. A. MITCHEL

I am an artist by profession, and when I was struggling for recognition it occurred to me that I must paint a picture in which I should put something sufficiently notable to give me a reputation. Being a painter of face and figure, I naturally looked about for a model. I found subjects in determination, in grace and other features, in figures, but I needed a face to go with each, and that I did not find.

When I moved into a new studio I looked out upon a court. The rooms facing me were occupied by offices of various kinds, and I could look into those on the same plane with me or a little below. The first morning I occupied my studio, I saw through a window opposite a youth some sixteen or seventeen years old sitting at a typewriter. I was impressed with his appearance at once. His face expressed honesty, principle, goodness. His profile, which was usually toward me, was beautiful, and his full face, which he often turned to look at his copy, was also beautiful, and each seemed to indicate that the young man contained within him elements to fit him for some noble work.

Here was what I had been long looking for. I did not care to copy his features exactly. What I wanted to put on the canvas was that nobleness, that goodness, expressed in his face. This I succeeded in doing beyond my most ardent expectations.

Before beginning to paint the picture, thinking of the subject I should choose for it, I was disposed to represent my model as doing some kindly act, but I finally concluded to paint him as he was—a typist. If, I argued, the goodness stands out in him on the canvas as a typist, how much more will be the triumph than if I represent him as a "good Samaritan." We expect goodness in the faces of those who profess to be good, but do not necessarily look for it in those engaged in ordinary occupations.

My picture passed the hanging committee of a certain gallery in which I was anxious to place it, and on the opening day I took a seat in the room where it was hung to watch its effect on the persons who passed it. There were pictures in the gallery by well-known artists, and most visitors were looking for such. Nevertheless the gazers gave at least a glance to all there were, and as most of them passed my picture they stopped for a few moments and looked at it. These seemed to be something near home in the subject, to say nothing of the individuality of the person depicted. But this was my own surmise.

I visited the gallery nearly every day and noticed a slowly growing interest in my picture. At last I saw persons who on coming into the room where it was hung looked about them evidently for some particular picture and finally found it in mine. This told me that it had begun to be talked about. Before the exhibition closed the painting as well as the artist had made some reputation.

It was about five years after this that a young man attracted attention by consecrating his life to the poor. He belonged to no organization and had no means of his own, but he soon found backers among wealthy persons who gave him money for his good works. It was not long before he was known throughout the land as one absolutely pure, noble and doing a good work.

Having heard of him and conceived a desire to see him, I called at his office—a shabby room in a rookery—with the ostensible purpose of making an offering for his work. What was my astonishment to see a man rise to receive me whom I recognized at once as the model for my picture. I made no mention of the coincidence, simply giving him the money I had brought and trespassing for a short while upon his duties in order to converse with him.

I made several visits to my model on one pretense or another and attempted to induce him to go with me to see the picture I had made of him when he was a typist. He was so busy that it was a long while before I could secure the time necessary for the purpose. At last I succeeded, and he went with me to where the painting hung. I had not told him that I was the artist. He stood for a long while looking at it intently, so intently that I expected when he spoke he would say, "That is myself shortly before I came of age." At last I broke in upon his feelings, his meditations or whatever they were by asking him what he thought of the picture.

"I have not thought of it as a work of art," he said. "I have been thinking how I would rejoice could I have within me one-tenth the nobility of soul expressed by that young man."

I was astonished. He had sat before a typewriter himself; he had been the model for the figure in the painting which had only approached that nobility of soul he mentioned, and yet he saw no likeness whatever to himself.

Should I tell him the truth? No. It was better that he should not know it. Better that not a grain of alloy should enter into his unconscious goodness. I led him away from the picture without enlightening him. He went back to his work of securing the unfortunate, no doubt nerved to greater exertion by having seen a portrayal of a good soul without recognizing it as his own.

NOTICE.—UNITED STATES LAND

Office Salt Lake City, Utah, June 12, 1913. To Whom It May Concern: Notice is hereby given that the state of Utah has filed in this office lists of lands, selected by the said state, under Section 6 of the act of congress, approved July 16, 1894, as indemnity school lands, viz: SE¼SE¼, and NW¼SE¼, Sec. 7, Twp. 13 South, Range 9 East, Salt Lake meridian, Serial 611592. Copies of said lists, so far as they relate to said tracts by descriptive sub-divisions, have been conspicuously posted in this office for inspection by any person interested and by the public generally.

During the period of publication of this notice, or any time thereafter, and before final approval and certification, under departmental regulations of April 25, 1907, protests or contests against the claim of the state to any of the tracts or sub-divisions hereinbefore described, on the ground that the same is more valuable for mineral than for agricultural purposes, will be received and noted for report to the general land office at Washington, D. C. Failure so to protest or contest, within the time specified, will be considered sufficient evidence of the non-mineral character of the tracts and the selections thereof, being otherwise free from objection, will be approved to the state.
